FOCUS ON WRITING: STUDENT SELF-CRITIQUES

Information from Writing Across the Curriculum at UW-Madison on using a self-evaluation cover sheet for student

To encourage students to think critically about their writing and to encourage students to develop as writers over the semester, some instructors find it very effective to ask students to write a cover sheet (or memo or letter) for each paper, responding to questions like these. You can, of course, adapt the questions you ask to reinforce the key elements of a particular assignment or genre. You can use students’ self-critiques as a starting point for personalizing your feedback on their work.

Self-Evaluation Cover Sheet

- What is your goal with this paper? What does this piece attempt to do?
- What's the point?
- What's the strongest aspect of this paper? What's working best?
- What are you still unhappy with? What would you have wanted to continue to work on?
- What aspects of this paper do you especially want comments on?
- Are you experimenting with anything in this paper? Are you trying anything new as a writer?

For more information on this topic, please visit “Student Self-Critique for a Paper” from Writing Across the Curriculum at UW-Madison.
