FOCUS ON WRITING: REVERSE OUTLINE

Information written by Rebecca Schoenike Nowacek, WAC Program, UW-Madison

What is a reverse outline?
A reverse outline is something you do after you write a draft.

How can a reverse outline be helpful?
The reverse outline can be an extremely useful tool for helping you see the big picture of your paper.

How can a student make a reverse outline?
1. Go through the paper and number each paragraph. Then, on a separate sheet of paper, write #1 and the main point(s) of that first paragraph. Then, on the next line write #2 and the main point(s) of the second paragraph. Go through the entire paper this way. When you have gone through the entire paper, you will have an outline giving you an overview of your entire paper.

Now ask yourself the following questions:
- Are the paragraphs properly focused, or are there multiple main ideas competing for control of a single paragraph?
- Now that you’ve identified the main point of each paragraph, does the topic sentence reflect that point?
- Are some of the ideas in a paragraph extraneous and should they therefore be deleted from the paper? Or do they simply need to be moved to a different part of the paper?
- When you look at the outline as a whole, does the organization of the paper reflect what you promised in your introduction/thesis? If the answer is no, consider whether you need to revise the thesis or revise the organization of the paper.
